Please note that all this content is user and its accuracy is not guaranteed really or this company. 0 As Millennials began pushing for a more flexible work environment where people could be themselves, one of the many areas to change was the corporate dress code. As a result, I'm happy to say the formal business suits and shirts I wore when I started working 20 years ago are now peacefully collecting dust in the corner of my wardrobe. The growth of the business casual dress code has allowed me to be more practical (and comfortable) as I can now mix and match my weekend wear with a few more professional pieces. Not to mention I can now let my personality shine through and be the real self at work. Those of us with a passion for fashion - or yep to be different - have been applauded as more and more large corporations introduce a flexible dress code policy. But I'm also mindful that for some people the current relaxed attitude to business clothes can be a little confusing when you're not sure how to dress for work. If your morning is busy enough without thinking about what to wear, then the vague terms in which corporations now couch their dress codes can be overwhelming. What does a business case really mean? At Accenture, we trust employees to make their own decisions about their work clothes. This means dressing in a way that makes you feel comfortable - choose clothes that make you feel authentic, proud and truly yourself. Respect for customers and colleagues - at work we do not just dress for ourselves. In an inclusive workplace, we must also be mindful of other people's feelings and cultures. Is safe and suitable for your work environment - think about an office or client site where you will spend most of your day and choose clothes and shoes that are appropriate. Adapt your wardrobe to fit into your client- dress for how you want to represent yourself and Accenture in front of the customer. We often say dress for your day. So if your client is a little more formal, then the dress is thus suitable for this. It's the same if they dress more casually. What should I wear for the interview? The same theory applies to interviews. Try to dress one layer more professionally than you on a typical day at work, but I always encourage people to let their personalities show through! If in doubt, just ask the recruiter or hiring manager what the dress code is like when you organize an interview. But I always wore a suit for work ... If you're still clinging to 20th-century corporate dress codes, I you with food for thought, quote from a Forbes interview on a changing workplace with Amazon's director, Rob Green. Rob says: started his career wearing a suit and tie, then moved into khaki pants with a button-down shirt and navy jacket. Now, I wear jeans and T-shirts to look relevant to these little kids at work who are smart as whips and can assimilate information at incredible speed. Wear a suit and you are fired as a person who can't keep up. Starting with the hall role of Accenture UK. I know the dress code will project depends, but I don't have any money until I get paid at the end of November, so really need to get a few things that will work for all situations. Any advice?
